Some students rack their brains choosing “Which university should i go?” and lots of them decide to stay in their hometown and they prefer to study somewhere around their houses. What are the pros and cons to this? Let’s find that out

The first argument we could say is that they rather keeping their lives as they were even though they have to quit options sometimes, it works for every single person who is not a fan of changes and they are comfortable where they are. But I bet you are thinking of one of the most convincing and persuasive against, which is the money, everyone says that it’s cheaper to stay home, I cannot really tell if that is true or false, but one thing to be sure is that it is not only the daily commute. A plus in this is that you don’t share a kitchen, or a bedroom, or a place with some others teenager, is that a truly benefit though? In spite of not being able to be in that university climate or not being able to be independent sometimes, there is much more to think of. Making the decision is similarly as hard as the studies.

To sum up, people have different experiences and you should try if you have the opportunity to do it. I imagine the benefits in each case but that does not mean you can’t live that moment and adventure in a different point of view
